

The Persecution of Falun Gong Spreads to Hong Kong

Blacklist 130 Falun Gong practitioners detained in Hong Kong airport according to the blacklist.

According to Hong Kong's Legislature, Falun Gong is legally registered and enjoys legal rights. Under the pressure from the Jiang's regime, however, Hong Kong officials have intensified their opposition to Falun Gong, illegal interference by the Hong Kong police has cause people to doubt Hong Kong's "one country, two systems" policy.

On March 15, 2002, 16 Falun Gong practitioners, including 4 from Switzerland, sat and appealed peacefully outside the Chinese Liaison Office to protest Jiang's new order "kill without mercy", which orders that policemen can shoot Falun Gong practitioners who tell the truth publicly. Hong Kong police forcefully carrying the practitioner away and forcefully dragged them into a police van, while other practitioners were practicing meditation.

July 1, 2002, during Jiang Zemin's visit to Hong Kong for the 5th anniversary of its return to China, 130 practitioners from the U.S., Taiwan, Australia, Japan, Sweden, Switzerland, Singapore, India, and other countries were denied entry into Hong Kong because their names appeared on a black-list supplied by Mainland China. Among them, over 90 Taiwan practitioners were deported. A few practitioners were even thrown into sacks and beaten. Passengers whose names coincided with some Falun Gong practitioners' names on the list were also deported.

Who Is Blocking the Path? The ensuing crowd of police officers caused access to the building to be blocked. So who is blocking the street, policemen or practitioners? (Apple Daily's Photos)

Plenty of Room The peaceful, quiet appeal did not block any access to the building, the sidewalk, or the street.

Police Choke 60-Year-Old Woman

A group of Hong Kong police forcefully detain a 60-year-old woman with their hands clasped around her throat and their fingers squeezing her face, as other Falun Gong practitioners meditate.
